The bunker was bought by Phillip Frostick, 56, in 1993 after it was spotted by his friend's dad in a newspaper.

He and a pal bought it with big plans to do it up - but gave up on the idea when they realised the full extent of the cost and effort it would take.

While it lay abandoned for the last thirty years, it was broken into, trashed and burned - with valuables lost including an award won for the best kept bunker.

But Phillip believes that it could take just a few weekends of hard work to bring it back to fighting shape.

He said: "At the time it was really bought as a bit of a folly, but we never knew what it might become.

"We thought we could do great things with it - and over the years I can't lie and say that I've never dropped it into conversation.

"At the back of my mind it's not getting better - hopefully there will be a club or a history buff that has got a bit more enthusiasm and energy than I have to bring it back to what it would be like."

Many of the monitoring posts were built to a standard design consisting of a 14ft access shaft with a toilet and a monitoring room.

Officers stationed at the posts would forecast which areas would be in danger from nuclear fall out in the case of an attack.

They were built underground with many still intact nearly 70 years on from when they were first commissioned in 1955.

With a guide price of £21,000 to £28,000, potential buyers can view the bunker on Unique Property Bulletin.
